By the second half of the 15th century, Cuzco was the epitome of the empire known as Tawantinsuyu, the "land of four quarters." Radiating outward from Cuzco's central plazas was the Inca Road, a system of constructed royal conduits dotted with way stations (tambos) and storage facilities (qolqa) that reached the entire empire. The ceque system was a similar network of hypothetical ley lines, a set of pilgrimage routes radiating out from Cuzco to connect hundreds of shrines out in the provinces.

Ancient Cuzco: Heartland of the Inca: Bauer, Brian S ...

The large and agriculturally rich Cuzco Valley emerged preeminent in the fifteenth century AD as the heartland of the Inca. Near the north end of the valley lies the sacred city of Cuzco. The region immediately surrounding the Cuzco Valley was occupied by a number of different ethnic groups that were absorbed into the Inca state during an early period of state formation.
