This is an exploration of the dynamics of male desire in the postmodern world replete with objects and it's inherent relationship with fantasy. In constructing our fantasy version of reality we establish coordinates for our desire, we situate ourselves and the object of our desire in a popular accessible context.

The Secret Life of Objects (2009) - IMDb

The only part I found odd about The Secret Life of Objects were the drawings included with some flash pieces. They were made by Raffel’s son Sean Evers, whom I believe is now in his early 20s, but still they look like children’s drawings. If Evers did draw them as a boy, that would be good to know.

A memoir different from most, able to reveal stories through objects owned, seen, touched and remembered. A mug, a painting, a glass angel, to name but a few, evoke not only where and how acquired but also the pathos, joy, humor and realizations that make up a life. With a deft and sure hand, Raffel depicts family members in ways that are magical.

One sees a film and one cannot, for whatever reason, forget a prop, or an artifact, or a doodad. And then one sees the same object in another film, made of course, by the same studio, from the same vintage. And sometimes props call attention to themselves – either by their extravagance or the singularity of their appearance.

Everyday objects such as paper clips and Cheez-Doodles are twisted into hilarious recreations of our everyday lives. Eggs, paper clips, popcorn, a bottle of white out, cheese doodles, and a thousand miniature accessories from doll houses combine into wacky and hysterical bad puns, play on words, and downright observational humor from the offbeat mind of Terry Border.
